

Trump's daughter Ivanka joined call with Argentina's Macri

BUENOS AIRES (Reuters) — Ivanka Trump, daughter of U.S. President-elect Donald Trump, briefly joined her father's telephone call with Argentine President Mauricio Macri earlier this month, Macri's spokesman said on Tuesday. The two men spoke on Nov. 14, making Macri one of the few Latin American leaders who had spoken with Trump in the days following his surprise victory in the U.S. presidential election. The call was aimed at rekindling a relationship formed when they worked as businessmen before entering politics. "At the end of the president's call with Trump, the phone was passed to Ivanka so he could say hello. They have known each other since she was quite young," the spokesman said. Argentine Foreign Minister Susana Malcorra said the congratulatory conversation helped re-establish the personal bond between the two leaders, despite Macri's earlier public support for Hillary Clinton during the election campaign. The spokesman denied reports that Trump discussed a pending office tower project in Buenos Aires during the conversation. Photographs taken at Trump Tower later showed Trump accompanied by Ivanka Trump and Jared Kushner during a meeting with Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe. Macri, who became president in December, has worked to strengthen relations between Argentina and the United States. According to accounts from the Macri family, Donald Trump and Mauricio Macri had known each other through business dealings dating back to the 1980s.
